

EXHIBIT 2

New York
The Jewish Week

11/01/2007

In Foxman's Long Shadow

By James D. Besser
Washington Correspondent

ADL's lay head Glen Lewy: Taking controversial positions is what we do. If you're going to fight anti-Semitism and bigotry, you're going to have to take aggressive decisions."

Mention the Anti-Defamation League, and the name Abraham Foxman –the group's longtime professional leader – leaps out. For Glen Lewy, the group's national chairman and top lay leader, that's not exactly a liability.

"We're blessed by having a dominant chief executive whose words carry weight, whose reputation has strength," he said in an interview on the eve of the group's national meetings here.

That, he says, gives the group a visibility in the media and clout in the political world....

Some critics have charged that the group has shifted resources away from the core issue of fighting anti-Semitism to a pro-Israel effort....

That shift appeals to donors, he said – and has opened the door to more corporate and foundation funding; 25 major "corporate partners" are supporting various ADL programs around the country....

www.PosseUSA.org